

Title

EN source - machine-translatable excerpt

Chapter One

The morning came grey and soft over the harbour of Saint Albans. Maren stood at the window of the small kitchen and watched the boats lean against their moorings, their hulls dripping with the tide that had left them long ago. Her father's coat still hung on 'You are thinking about him again,' said her mother, without turning from the stove. The 'I am only listening,' Maren answered. 'The whole house is full of him. I can almost Her mother set two mugs on the table and sat at last, folding her hands around the warmer one. 'Then let it remember. But do not forget that the tide always comes back,