The committee met every Thursday in a room that smelled faintly of old paper and cold coffee. Dr. Okonkwo arrived first, as she always did, and spread her notes across the long table with the patience of someone who had learned to expect nothing in 'When do you think it will be ready?' asked the chairman, tapping his pen against the 'When it is finished,' she replied. 'That is the only answer we have ever been given Nobody laughed, though the words were nearly funny. Instead each person looked out the window at the grey courtyard and imagined the year they had spent on the project
